Classification Review Procedure

CRP 81-13

Information Indicative of Questionable Activities

1. CRP 79-33 requires all classification reviewers to be alert during their systematic review of Agency records for information that could indicate Agency involvement in questionable activities. Several examples of such activities are listed. We now have a current case, the Wilson/Terpil case, that is raising many questions about the propriety of the actions of several former CIA officials. Many details have already appeared in the press and on TV and CIA is indirectly implicated in some accounts. To prevent any accusation of "cover up," it is important that all pertinent information available in CIA that could relate to this matter be uncovered and brought to the attention of proper authorities. To ensure that this is done, the Director has ordered a thorough review of all Agency records. CRD records have not produced such information. The systematic review process, however, conceivably could turn up pertinent information possibly not available in any other way. All reviewers and Intelligence Assistants (IAs), therefore, must be alert for such information. To assist you, we are listing below the names of the persons involved, the pseudonyms and aliases that they used in CIA, lists of the places they served, a general description of the type of work that they engaged in, and companies of interest. This personal record information is classified and must be handled accordingly. It is intended solely as an aid to focus reviewer/IA attention during records review to ensure as best as we can that no pertinent information will be overlooked. Specific information sought includes: (1) any interaction between selected Agency employees and Wilson or Terpil; (2) Agency awareness of [redacted] and (3) pertinent files, if any, on Wilson's or [redacted] companies. Should you find information that sheds light on any of these specific points or that could relate to this matter regardless of how vague or slight the connection might be, bring it to the attention of your Branch Chief.

2. Biographical information on the personalities involved is as follows:
